

These are examples of some of the digital annotations left by my students for the They Say/ I Say strategy. Some of the comments are better than others, but the majority of my students participated well.

the chickens for a month-long biology program for the students. Since then, Maguire has been given the nickname "Chicken Daddy."

The school's chicken program quickly became a hit. After the chickens hatched in the spring of 2024, students began filing into Maguire's office to pet the baby birds.

Whitman staff saw just how much the kids enjoyed spending time with the chickens. So they soon decided to keep the birds around, Maguire said.

A year of caretaking passed, and as the seventh-graders turned into eighth-graders, the chicks turned into red-feathered adult hens. The kids soon got attached to the chickens and the chickens to the kids. The chickens even recognize the kids' faces and voices and waddle toward the door when they spot the students arriving.

Companionship And Life Skills

Throughout the school year, students have gained companionship from the animals. They've also learned some life skills.

The students are responsible for refilling the chickens' feed supply, which costs about $25 for 50 pounds. They pay for the feed with money they make from selling some of the chickens' eggs. Fortunately for the students, the program started just as there was a growing demand for cheaper eggs. Selling the eggs has helped the students understand how to make a program last and pay for

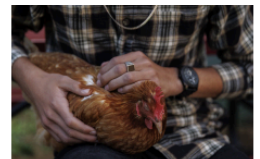

Image 1. A chicken nearly falls asleep in a student's lap. Photo: Moriah Ratner/The Washington Post