

Reflection for Say-Mean-Matter

I provided instructions in a slide presentation and gave a brief overview of the task information. I asked students to read and annotate independently. Then, I had them work in small groups to complete a Say-Mean-Matter organizer on large sticky notes. After students finished, they shared out what their group wrote on the organizers. Lastly, students used this information to write a short response to the article and the specific information they noted on their group's organizer.

As the students worked through each step, I modeled how I completed each step of the reading, annotating, and filling out of the organizer. We have been doing these types of activities all year; however, this specific strategy was new to them. It did not take a lot of instructing or modeling, but I did want them to see the significance of applying this strategy to help them dig deeper into their conversations with the text. Thus far, my students struggle to really respond to texts with deep thought. I think this strategy will provide a more definite process for them to use as they analyze written texts and work to respond using more thoughtful evidence and comments.

Read the article, "Denmark's Government Aims to Ban Access to Social Media for Children Aged Under 15"

Annotate: Mark it up! Highlight & note: Questions/thoughts/comments you have about any comments/stats/remarks in the text.

Compile: Use the large sticky note to compile things you see & comments you have.

This can be a blend of all of your thoughts! No need to try to come up with one thought or force agreement about which part of the text you want to discuss.